This was a bit of a surprise - this is my friend's girlfriend, who had come along for another shoot. Typically she's quite shy, but in between other photos she picked up some fabric and started twirling, so I quickly grabbed a few shots and we both really liked how a few of them turned out. Lighting/setup isn't ideal, but I like how it's wrapped her like a cocoon - it feels tied to her reserved personality but also her moments of exuberance (like this!).

This is the closest I've ever had a photo align with my original vision. My friend was doing some bodybuilding and asked for some photos to record his progress, and let me sneak in a few creative entries at the end. The idea was to wrap him in tule and have him pull against it, contrasting the soft flows of the fabric with the tension and strength in his muscles. Main light is behind him to light up the fabric, with another in front to bring some light to his face. Just out of frame is his girlfriend, flapping the ends of the fabric, to give it some texture.

Honestly no good story for this one, just goofing around with a friend and liked the result. I really like low key rim lighting, and particularly in this one I like how the light gets picked up by the inner half of each iris, it adds a lot of intensity to his (otherwise quite mellow) expression. Shot with a couple of cheap, portable lights in his living room, with a whisky I'd brought as a housewarming gift.
